Between these two stations, thirty miles apart, experiments have been confidered for two menths by a board of neval officers, and the results which have been obtained during the last few weeks are highly satisfactory in many respects.

The important development in the trials is that the interference by stray currents of electricity generated by electric muchin-ery in the navy yard here and in the shops at Annapolls have been overcome in part. This gives promise that even better re-sults will be obtained when the systems now in use are tried at sea, where there is not, ordinarily, so much interference as on Four systems of wireless apparatus are n use. The instruments, two sets of which are of French manufacture and two of German manufacture, were putchased abroad last summer by Lieutenant Hudgins, who is probably better versed in the science of wireless telegraphy than any other officer in the mavy.

The original plan of experiment was to try each of these systems over all land courses, then between a staffon on land and a warship at sea, and then between two warships

AS A CARTOONIST. Thomas Nast's name is almost inseparable from that of Bill Tweed and his ring, who plundered New York and to whose overthrow Mr. Nast's historic pencil contributed so much. It was often said that Mr Nast's pencil was the one thing of which Tweed stood in fear. When Mr. Nast's picture, a group of vultures waiting for the storm to blow over, with the caption, "Let us pray," came out, a cartoon which was condensed eloquence Itself, the old politician emixed the ery which has gone down in the municipal history of New York City;

"Can't you stop those pictures? I den't care what they write about me, but those infernal pictures hurt." Another of Mr Nast's represented Tweed as a money-bag. With a few strokes of his pencil he converted a representation of a bag of gold into a caricarure of Tweed's face.

One of the most forceful pictures Nast ever drew was printed in September, 1871, showing Tweed, Sweeny, Connolly and Hall sitting near a superb country seat, with bubbling fountains and statuary, the four drinking bumpers of champagne, resting literally on beds of roses. Beneath the Tammany bosses, on a bed of thorns, tossed their constituents, the poor man seated beside a cheap coffin, in an ill-furnished havel, with his children about him crying for bread.

Nast has not been before the public to any extent for many years. He was gradually oushed aside by younger men, who had the advantage of artistic training, which he never enjoyed. But Nost's strength was above technical polish. It was largely due to the force of his ideas and the power and fertility of his invention. When the Civil War began Nast went to the front as an illustrator for Harper's. It was not until after the war that Nast disovered and developed the tendency for caricature that a few years later, in the warfare on the Tweed ring, made him one of the most famous men in this country, Mr. Nast leaves a widow in Morristown,
